This is consistent with the observation that the function of the tibialis anterior is not affected by fascicle lengthening, as we previously reported.12{ref-type="ref"} Furthermore, there was no significant difference in the muscle function between the three modes of lengthening, indicating that different degrees of lengthening have minimal influence on the function of the tibialis anterior muscle. CONCLUSIONS {#bem22188-sec-0022} =========== The present study shows that during passive knee extension, the muscle function of the tibialis anterior is not affected by different degrees of fascicle lengthening within 24% of its original length, which may be related to the altered biomechanics. The tibialis anterior is an important stabilizer of the ankle joint and it is necessary for the normal walking and running activities. Our findings may be helpful for designing an appropriate training mode of tibialis anterior function during lengthening exercises. Supporting information ========================
