A model of primary occupational exposure to polycyclic aromatic hydrocarbons (PAH) is proposed as a practical tool for assessing potential health risks. The model involves both the physiological interaction of benzo[a]pyrene (B[a]P) with the lung epithelial cells and extrapolation of that interaction to the body as a whole. Although the model was originally developed for human health effects, it is a useful model for effects of low level chronic exposure of laboratory animals. The model explains well the B[a]P-induced skin carcinogenesis in animals and quantitatively predicts the dose dependence of B[a]P-DNA adduct formation in the lung epithelial cells of these animals.
