In 2008, Nick and Sam Lavin, along with their friends, opened a brewery in the tiny American hamlet of Ashland, Virginia. In the years that followed, they and their partners had enough success to get to the point where they were recognized as one of the top breweries in the country. As they and other microbrewers built upon their success, they began to notice something. Something strange. It was a common trend: most of the popular craft beer you could get in your area came from a macrobrewer that was headquartered in the city. But where did all of this water come from to make all of the beer? A week ago, the microbrewers sat at the 2019 Craft Brewers Conference and discussed this very problem. In a press conference following the convention, Sam Lavin, the co-founder of Victory, explained that this problem was not a secret, but it was more prevalent than people realize. "We're at 34% of the beer produced in the United States comes from water sourced
