This timer must be able to fire an event every second, and it must be nonblocking. The problem with System.currentTimeMillis() is that it blocks the execution thread. A: How about Timer? How is it blocking the execution thread? A: System.nanoTime() is non-blocking, and returns the nanoseconds since the Java virtual machine was started. It also gives a resolution of about one millionth of a second, which is sufficient for most applications. nanoTime() can be used to determine the elapsed time between two events. check out here for more information about java.util.Timer Please note, that you need to use the correct class depending on the architecture you're using: DefaultTimer ScheduledTimer A: The Timer class already provides non-blocking functionality with the final method: stop() and the final method: pause() The pause() method will ensure that all the events scheduled to be executed by the timer are cancelled, and the final state of the timer is in "suspended" state, waiting to be resumed. If you want to cancel the timer, you may use the cancel() method. The stop() method will suspend the timer, making any pending events
