This report concentrates on the five forms of free time that are accessible to all citizens: self-care, exercise, entertainment, worship, and education. Each form of free time offers citizens with different activities to do if they wish to escape the workplace or have some fun during down time. These opportunities occur in both public and private environments, suggesting that the forms of free time are embedded in everyday life and, in this sense, present a form of popular politics. For example, physical activities like sports and exercise provide an outlet for physical tensions and anxieties and a space for people to develop healthier lifestyles.
