With the new features in Adob added, the application really has started to move forward. A new Brushes panel allows view of brushes and brush collections, not available previously. Artboards, a master set of customizable tools, were introduced in CS6 and allow the creation of well-edited artwork that is easily manipulated. This tool can be very useful, particularly if you work with older version and save your project in a newer version. CDL files, named by version, allow the photo editing software to look for links to the Cloud Documents, so you may work on a document on your laptop, save it and continue work from the device with a link to the desktop version. Previous versions of any file are grouped in the History panel and provide a layer-by-layer view of the edit. Bonus: the Navigator panel provides a map-like view, with a pencil, and the History panel displays the version history of any document. And the addition of the new content-aware tool, the Content-Aware Move tool lets you perform fast image restores, clone tool creating multiple copies with different presets, and even resume editing. The CS6 Photoshop has many performance enhancements. It's consistently faster than the version I used to review. To give you an idea, my copy of Photoshop CC with presets ran the Edit Images feature at 240 fps. CS6 runs it at 600 fps. I had to play with other features to get the performance up, and still it wasn't fast enough. If the next version is similar, it will be as quick as this one.
