Adobe confirmed the test, which users have been awaiting, yesterday. The second key feature is addition of location tagging for people and places in images. The major function that still needs to be worked on, however, is time-lapse shooting. Then everything can be full of colours and ornaments that make your photo film look like a quick film of a trip to the cinema. In the new "Fill Hot Spots" function, it is also possible to partially fill selected places in a photo, making it look like if the camera just recorded a magic picture. Another major change is that the order of the filters in the menu options are reversed. That means that the top option is now "Enhance." Can you imagine that Adobe never let users tag their images?) Because the user interface of Photoshop has changed, it is likely that organisations will need to pilot the new software for a few weeks before bringing the new software into their network. Many users currently using the software will not feel any compatibility issues, but some may find it difficult to use the update. That said, the future roadmap of the software is a bit confusing. So far there is no hint of when Adobe will upgrade the rest of the software, meaning, for example, that the popular Photoshop animation feature will have to be done in After Effects.
